Wedding planning can get overwhelming, at the same time, it could be fun. The items on the planning list will differ for everyone, of course, but here are a few you might be stressing over, even though there's no reason to.

Setting Your Budget

Set a realistic and healthy budget right from the start. Pick a night and order take-out, sit down with your partner, and talk about all the items on the list that are important to you both.

Researching Vendors

You want to get your dream team for your special day. But finding professional vendors within your budget takes a lot of time and energy. Start by researching different styles, check their websites, and read customer reviews. Then the best thing to do is select three in the category you need and narrow them down to the one you think is suitable for you. It'll be worth the effort when you finally find the pros for you.

Creating a Wedding Website

You might be wondering if you actually need a wedding website. We would suggest having one. It's the perfect way to share important wedding information with all your guests in a pretty and convenient place. You can share wedding time, date, location, dress code, engagement photos, and more. We think you'll enjoy creating it.

Registering for Gifts

It's all about choosing the wedding gifts you need, want, and love. If it's time consuming, you can always register for cash gifts to fund amazing experiences and important future expenses.

No need to worry: cash gifting is officially cool and classy. And if you feel uneasy about asking for presents, let your registry help someone in need. Set up your registry so charities of your choosing receive donations every time a guest buys a gift.

Cutting Your Guest List

Narrowing down the guest list gets a bit tricky, but it's definitely achievable. A lot of couples put it off because of many sensitive topics they have to deal with, such as budget and family expectations. But it's something they just need to sit down and do together. Make an A (must) and a B (maybe) guest list. If you need to trim your guest list, start from the B (maybe) list until you get your guest count to a perfect size. This task will be satisfying once you get your head count down.

Figuring Out Your Seating Chart

Arranging your seating chart could get difficult, but there is a special seat for each of your guests at each reception table. It'll take a bit of finagling, but you can tackle this task together. Try and keep the same age groups and family members together. Grandparents and great grandparents should be sitting away from the DJ or a band. Your guests will sit at the tables during their dinner and then head on over to the dance floor. That's where you want them to be anyway.

Writing Thank-You Notes

The trick for not getting overwhelmed doing this task is to keep track of who had sent which gift and when. It also helps to write your notes as you receive the gifts so they don't pile up. Create a spreadsheet to store everyone's addresses and to record gifts received and thank-you notes sent. When the pile does get high, it's okay to ask your partner for help. After all, the gifts you receive are for both of you and a start to a beautiful life together.
